Marx's Concept of Human Nature. In this novel treatment of an old topic, Norman Geras has found himself facing in two diametrically opposite directions: within the Marxist tradition, there are those who wish to deny legitimate room for any concept of human nature; and there are others who, so far from wishing to deny the attribution of common characteristics to human beings, think such statements about human nature to be merely self-evident, banal and therefore no integral part of a ...

Marx's theory of human nature - Wikipedia

"Marx did not reject the idea of a human nature. He was right not to do so." That is the conclusion of this passionate and polemical new work by Norman Geras. In it, he places the sixth of Marx's Theses on Feuerbach under rigorous scrutiny. He argues that this ambiguous statement—widely cited as evidence that Marx broke with all conceptions of human nature in 1845—must be read in the context of Marx's work as a whole.

Geras makes a painstaking case that Marx's rejection of theories of human behavior that relied on an ahistorical notion of human nature IS NOT a rejection of 'human nature' tout court. Marx had a notion of human nature, just one highly inflected and mediated by 'the ensemble of human social relations.'
