What does the "Arab Spring" imply for democratization theory? In this article, we first re-examine the relationship between democracy and the "twin tolerations" in the world's Muslim-majority countries that are democracies—Indonesia, Turkey, Senegal and Tunisia, as well as in Muslim-minority India. Second, we characterize the emergence of what we call an "authoritarian-democratic hybrid" form of regime and explore why a regime of this type has emerged in Egypt but not in Tunisia.

Viewpoint: Why Arab Spring has not delivered real democracy

As in the Arab Spring events, popular concerns focus on universal problems: a perceived lack of democracy, few economic opportunities, especially for young people, what some see as a lack of equality for women compared to men. Together, such concerns add up to a situation where many people, especially among the young, see little hope for a satisfactory future.
